Liminal Objects is an ongoing series of black-and-white works utilizing simple computer animation. The images are displayed on a 14-inch monitor that has been removed from its housing and placed either horizontally or vertically on a metal platform three feet in height. Each work in the series involves two objects that, in a sense, violate each other's borders in unpredictable ways. Typically, one of the objects sits in stillness while the other moves in, around and through it in a repetitive interaction and circular logic that suggest different readings of these veritable micro scenes. In these works, Hill has deprived the objects of the ability to produce shadows and from having color or texture; instead they remain rigorously textual and playfully idiomatic.

In Liminal Objects #7, an apple sits perfectly still while a gyroscope spins, moves around randomly, wobbling from time to time and every so often entering the apple. At one point the gyroscope finds the very center of the apple, and its axis, slightly off centered, encircles the apple's stem.
