Description:

Sixteen modified 4-inch black-and-white video monitors (cathode ray tubes removed from chassis) with projection lenses, sixteen adjustable metal brackets, pressure-sensitive switch mats, black or dark gray carpet, computer with sixteen RS-232 control ports and controlling software written in DOS, sixteen laserdisc players and sixteen laserdiscs (black-and-white; silent)

Dimensions of corridor: 10 h. x 10 w. x 90 l. ft. (3 x 3 x 27 meters)

Edition of two and one artist's proof

Tall Ships consists of sixteen 4-inch black-and-white video monitors with sixteen angled projection lenses, which are mounted in a line down the center of the ceiling of a completely dark, corridor-like space. There is one projection approximately every five feet alternating from side to side (i.e., approximately every ten feet on each side), and the last projection is seen on the back wall. The projections are of people of varying ethnic origin, age and gender. The images are high-contrast yet soft with a halo-like quality due to the nature of the projection system and the acute angle of projection. There is no border of light defining the frame of the image; it is the figure itself that gives off the light and is seen directly on the wall. The figures, standing or seated and ranging from one to two feet high, first appear in the distance, at about eye level. As the viewer(s) walk through the space, electronic switches are activated and the figures approach the viewer until they reach approximately life-size. They remain in the foreground, slightly wavering, until the viewer(s) leave the immediate area. Each of the projections is independently interactive with the viewers; thus, according to the number of viewers in the space, any number of the people/projections could appear in the distance – approaching, withdrawing, or standing in the foreground – at any given time.
